A pressure displacement medical fluid pulse machine or system for medical use, for delivering or administering fluids, fluent solids, air or a mixture thereof at a predetermined positive pressure and volume, delivered from either a pressurized source such as pressurized sealed cylinders or a non-pressurized source like oxygenators, including a booster pump (17) for increasing or decreasing pressure of the flow, valves, sensors and regulators to maintain desired pressure and direction of flow, a feeder and delivery chamber combination to ensure positive displacement. The machine or system for delivering or administering fluids, fluent solids, air or a mixture thereof at a pulsating pressure which further includes an adjustable valve (12) and a spring mechanism (19) in the delivery chamber which is moved up and down via a push pull rod (13) connected to a linear actuator or motor/cam assembly (14) which, in case of an emergency, shut off valves (6) at various points offer a modular elimination in the system and for patients with inhalation requirements different from that preset in the system, inspiratory pumps (20) in each patient circuit offer the required pressure modulation enabling simultaneous delivery at a different pressure setting. The system further facilitates connection to a screen monitor which includes an oxygen centralized sampling unit, a data acquisition unit, a remote data transmission device and a flow monitoring unit.
